Whiletherewasawell-establishedpropheticexpectationforafutureinwhi Such modes of "reading" the Gospels center all their attention on the "historical" Jesus. On the other side of the spectrum, if we focus on Jesus solely as God, we lose the very humanity that Jesus limited Himself to and may potentially believe His teachings as impossible. By sinning, we therefore fail to give God something that we owe .

The latter belief, inspired by Wittgenstein, holds that language itself onl allowing perspectives from the Orthodox and Catholic traditions to dialogue with the theological insights of the Reformed and Protestant communities, perhaps we can facilitate the kind of ecumenical spirit needed to tread such precarious theological territory. I suspect the latter scenario includes most of us in varying degrees.
